TRANSFORMATION IN AMERICA

Back in the dear, dead days when another war was something that might possibly happen some day there was a parlor argument that went like this:

A-"They'll never be able to make Americans for get what happened the last time. We've had our fingers scorched once too often. The United States will let the countries that started it do the fighting the next time. The United States is disillusioned."

B-"Yes, but when the next time comes it will be the same thing all over again. We've forgotten in our disillusionment about post-war events that what we fought for the other time still was a big idea. Just let the people get started up again and the bands start playing and Americans won't have changed much.

The bands haven't played much yet and the people haven't been stirred up, but there are beginning to be signs that Americans haven't changed much. They still bristle outwardly and crawl inwardly at the sight and sound of political arrogance, whether practiced in the name of the divine right of kings or dictatorship

Their instinct still prompts them to mutter, 'Nuts!" when they are forbidden to do something they always have been taught to believe was one of their inalienable rights, such as using the oceans. And while they don't take much stock in the notion that any one nation should make a practice of forbidding other nations to do as they please, having even refused an invitation to join a society to forbid governments to go to war, they are full and fed up with the general idea of war.

They were willing, after the last war, to do almost anything to preserve peace, short of exercising the right, which was theirs by virtue of being tor dog, of beating the brains out of the next fellow who wanted to start a fight. It hasn't been customary to talk frankly about this, but if the United States had seized its advantage when the World war was over it was the only country with the resources and manpower to become a major military power overnight Instead, the United States sank its battleships, disarmed its soldiers, junked its equipment and set a virtuous example in the ways of peace.

It conducted another one of the noble experiment it is famous for. It was meek. It believed in Sante Claus, the Blue Fairy and the fundamental goodness of all mankind. It extended credit and the right hand of fellowship. The United States may have been stupid, naive and gullible, but no one can say it didn't try to practice what it had been preaching about live and let live.

But as it turned out, the United States, which could have been head bouncer for the whole world got nothing for passing up a privilege other nations would have loved to exercise except the horse laugh While it was being meek and peace-loving, and getting flabby and out of practice, some of the governments that hadn't taken the peace business too seriously were preparing diligently to beat up the whole world and run things thereafter by strong-arming Fourth st. and terror.

They did not reckon without the United States. Make no mistake about that. They figured out the United States to a T. Americans, they felt certain, the teachers of the High school. would sit tight and let the strong-armers get away of war. Americans, themselves, said so.

Unfortunately, the strong-armers didn't underabout what would happen in the next war, the side in Willoughy. that claimed Americans hadn't changed much and Mr. and Mrs. William Fawcett of Elisworth rd.

The strong-armers completely overlooked the ef- versity. fect they were bound to have on a nation which originated out of resentment against their kind.

has spent its energy shouting, "Me too!" or "Not on if sustained by practical, persistent and enduring efyour life!" when it might better have been saying, "Let's do this thing right." It has been alternately chasing and lying down in front of a bandwagon. There would have been more percentage in staying on the bandwagon and improving the band.
